TUESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 2.

ELECTRIC CANDLES—A NEW THING.
Among other battles at which one assists this moment in France is that between electric candles and gaslight. Yesterday evening I visited this peculiar candle manufactory, in the Avenue des Villiers, the director of which is a Russian engineer and also the inventor, M. Joblockoff. Now, as Voltaire observed, light comes from the air. The laboratory is lit up with pictures and colored stuff, which can be as easily distinguished in their shades as in full noon day. The candles have the same ratio to gas and oil lamps as sun to moonlight. The inventor poured some glasses of water on the flame of his dipo, but they burned away all the same. They emit no smoke, and consequently cannot blacken objects, nor any heat—350 times less than an ordinary candle—hence books will not fall out of their bindings, nor tapestry turn into black stuff. There can be no fire, no explosion, and the light can be laid on some three to fifteen times cheaper than gas or oil light. The light does not tremble or twinkle much, and none at all if it passes through a globe slightly opaque. The candle is composed of two cylindrical sticks of charcoal, separated by a preparation of sand, ground glass and kaolin; a magneto-electric machine furnishes the current, which flows from one point to the other of the charcoal rods. Each candle burns three hours, and the extinction of one lights up another.—San Francisco Call.
